A former security manager at Dulles International Airport was given a $500 fine last week for running a prostitution ring out of his Silver Spring hotel room in February.

Bryant Jermaine Livingston, 39, of Manassas, Va., was arrested during a training session at Dulles on March 16, four weeks after Montgomery County police were called to his hotel room in the Crowne Plaza Hotel, 8777 Georgia Ave., in Silver Spring on March 16, according to charging documents.

Livingston was charged with four counts of general prostitution. He pleaded guilty to and was convicted of one count at trial Thursday in Montgomery County District Court.

Jason W. Cleckner, Livingston's private defense attorney, declined to comment on the verdict Friday, citing an agreement he made with Livingston not to discuss the case.

The maximum penalty for prostitution is one year in prison and a $500 fine, according to Maryland law. If Livingston violates his probation before June 2013 he could serve up to a year in jail, according to court documents.

Montgomery County police originally were called to Livingston's hotel room by a hotel manager who noticed an unusual amount of people coming in and out of Livingston's room, police said. The manager said Livingston was a frequent guest and such activity was not uncommon, but this was the first time they had called the police, according to charging documents.

Livingston opened the door and gave the officers a business card from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Transportation Security Administration identifying him as a security manager. In the room officers found 11 people, including "three naked females and four males attempting to get dressed," the documents state.

A warrant was not issued for Livingston's arrest until after Feb. 28, when detectives spoke to one of the men who had been in the room and learned that Livingston had charged the man $100 to enter the room and engage in sexual activities, the charging documents state.

A previous investigation was made against Livingston, who no longer works for the TSA, by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Office of the Inspector General in 2009, according to the charging documents, which state that a TSA inspector contacted county police shortly after Livingston's arrest.
