The News broke the tawdry story of Monty Green's misdeeds on Friday.

The Brooklyn cop suspected of moonlighting as a pimp has been slapped with departmental charges, Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said Friday.

Internal Affairs investigators began amassing wiretap and surveillance evidence against Officer Monty Green after they were tipped to his deeds in July 2009.

He was taped "discussing prostitution-related activities," according to an internal investigative report, and in a conversation with a suspected pimp Green admitted having sex with a hooker and said he wanted to pimp her out.

The case stalled at the end of 2009 when the Brooklyn district attorney's office told the NYPD there was not enough evidence to file criminal charges — largely because a number of prostitutes were afraid to testify against him, sources said.

When the Daily News asked the NYPD about the case this week it said it had been working on the case all along and that it was close to charging Green in an effort to fire him.

Cops would not specify the details of the charges, though sources said they likely will include conduct unbecoming an officer.

Green, a seven-year veteran who had been assigned to the 73rd Precinct, has been on modified duty since December 2009 for an unrelated menacing case.

He told the News this week he has done nothing wrong.
